Giant By-passes Law and Gravity

Written by law correspondent Monty Brown

Rising star chef, Giant (31) was sent to court last week after suspected murder and robbery of the Bank of England. After a thorough investigation, was proved guilty at Clinco Court of Justice.

The Baked Bean's celebrity chef (giant) fell from the sky, last month, to great surprise from the public. Since then his popularity has only risen. As co-founder of the café (Baked Bean) he has served many delightful meals to delighted customers. Giant was left bankrupt after emptying his pockets on a new flyover, so wasn't the last suspect when £10,000,000 went missing from the Bank of England. Along with the missing money, accountant, Stirling Pound's life was taken from him.

After watching the CCTV Cameras back, officials announced that Baked Bean chef was the convict. Uproar from the people led to the footage to be played on the BBC. The people were forced to believe that their saviour was the accused.

The giant's case will be presented to the Court next Monday, to great anticipation from the public. One of the selected jurors (who does not wish to be named) commented, 'I am looking forward to being a part of such an important trial, I will not be bias but treat this trial like any other.' Although the Giant pleads his innocence, the trial will go ahead at Clinco Court of Justice lead by judge Chris Maguire. "The trial could go on for days maybe weeks, but we will come out with our verdict."

Chef to murderer, with the wrecking of the bypass, the giant turned bankrupt as well as landing himself a job so no one expected him to be a criminal! The giant (and the public) eagerly await his trial and his future. He hopes to be cleared of all charges and allowed to cook again.
